3-3:30 pm Room 108	Ethical and Responsible Data Stewardship In a world of 25 billion connected devices and 450 exabytes of data, the lines are blurred between informative and creepy, smart and invasive, efficient and vulnerable. Even if companies are not breaking laws when designing or using products and services that gather or use large amounts of data, the public relations consequences of missteps or blunders by anyone in the supply chain can be significant. Trustworthiness starts with an ability to explain how the technology works. While we're under the hood implementing and auditing new technologies, we can be taking steps to improve ethical and responsible data stewardship. This session reviews the European Commission guidelines for trustworthy artificial intelligence, how these guidelines mirror those proposed in the U.S., and where they are being used to develop industry standards for advanced automation, analytics, and algorithmic decision making.
